The issue of narcotrafing in Mexico is one of the most complex and controversial subjects in modern geopolitics. It is not merely a criminal problem but a multi-dimensional crisis involving economy, security and social fabric. While some argue for strcted militarization, others suggest that the "war on drugs" has only escalated the violence, leaving the country in a cycle of conflict.

The biggest argument usually centers on how the gob. handles the cartels. Back in 2006, the move to bring the military into the streets was supposed to fix things but it ended up being a double-edge sword. On one hand, you've got a police force that's often underfuned or corrupted.

Then you've got the whole "narco-culture" wich is super divisive. In a lot of places where the government is basically ghosting the citizens, the cartel steps in. This makes it really har to just ~~ease~~ the problem because there are many young people joining to their group.

At the end of the day our country doesn't know how to fight against these criminal groups, the cycle just keeps spinning wheter the answer is legalizing certain things or focusing in social problems the only thing we are sure about is that the "shot-out" method hasn't brought the peace each one of us is looking for.
